June quarter CPI preview: 18 July, 10:45am

13 July 2017

- We expect a 0.1% rise in the Consumer Price Index (CPI) for the June quarter, which would reduce the annual inflation rate to 1.8%.
- A well-publicised spike in vegetable prices has been offset by a fall in fuel prices.
- Our forecast is lower than the Reserve Bank's estimate of a 0.3% quarterly rise. However, the Reserve Bank was already expecting the recent pickup in inflation to recede over the coming year.
- We expect the OCR to remain unchanged until 2019, in contrast to market expectations of a rate hike by mid-2018.

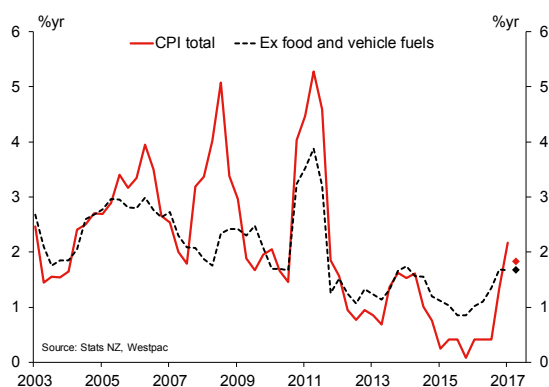

New Zealand's inflation figures are often thrown around by temporary factors, and so far this year has been no different. There was an unusually large 1% rise in prices over the March quarter, led by gains in food and fuel prices. Those two items will also play an important role in the June quarter figures, though this time their net impact on the inflation rate will be negative. We expect a subdued 0.1% rise in the CPI for the June quarter, which would see annual inflation recede from 2.2% to 1.8%.

Taking out food and fuel prices gives us a clearer picture of where inflation is heading. On this metric, inflation bottomed out some time in 2015 and has risen gradually since then, though it remains below the 2% midpoint of the Reserve Bank's target band. This is consistent with our view that while the economy is growing at a solid pace, it's not at risk of overheating.

Our forecast is lower than the 0.3% quarterly increase that the Reserve Bank forecast in its May Monetary Policy Statement. A downside surprise on inflation is unlikely to be too much of a concern for the Reserve Bank, which had already concluded that the recent pickup was temporary and that inflation would be well below 2% again by next year.

However, it would present a challenge to financial markets, which in our view are too eager to assume that the RBNZ will soon join the club of central banks that are contemplating interest rate hikes. Markets are pricing in an OCR hike by June next year. In contrast, we expect no move in the cash rate before 2019.

Annual inflation

Details

Our forecast of a 0.1% increase for the quarter reflects a balance of seasonal influences and some temporary factors. Starting with the one-offs, food prices were up by around 0.7% in the June quarter, led by a spike in vegetable prices after recent flooding wiped out some crops. While this is boosting the inflation rate today, it's likely to be a drag by next year, as the new season's crops hit the market. (In fact, that price spike had already unwound substantially by June.)

The second factor is that fuel prices were lower on average over the June quarter. Previously, fuel prices had given a strong boost to inflation as world oil prices rebounded from unsustainably low levels. That effect has now passed:

oil prices have now reached a level that has encouraged frackers in the US to crank up production again, which has put a cap on prices.

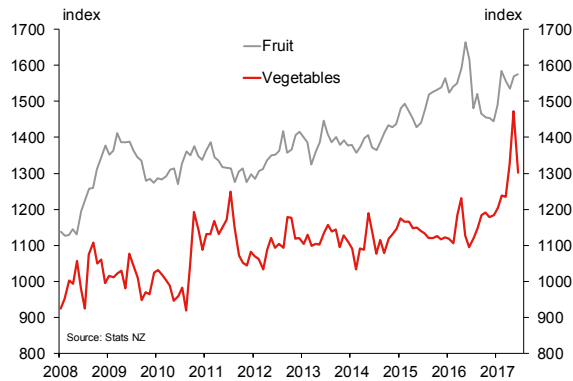

Aside from these two factors, we expect tradable goods inflation to be muted over the quarter. The strong rise in the New Zealand dollar over 2016 has not yet fully been reflected in the prices of imported goods such as clothing, cars, electronics and home furnishings.

We expect seasonal items to have a slight negative influence in the June quarter. Electricity prices, which are most commonly adjusted in the June quarter, had a relatively small 1% increase this year. We also expect a sharp drop in domestic airfares and car rentals as they come off their summer peaks. (International airfares, however, are more likely to rise to reflect the increase in fuel costs over the last year.)

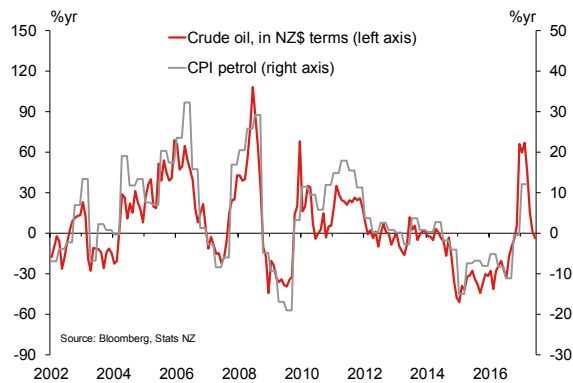

Housing-related prices have consistently been a positive contributor to inflation in recent years. We're expecting more of the same, with a 0.6% increase in rents and a 0.8% rise in new dwelling prices. Notably, we think the latter may be past the peak in terms of its impact on the inflation rate. In the June quarter last year, new home prices rose sharply due to the costs associated with new health and safety regulations. That effect will drop out of the annual inflation rate this time. Moreover, building costs tend to follow the trend in existing house prices, which have slowed sharply in recent months.
