

Dairy Update

7 August 2019

We expect the recent escalation in the US-China trade war to lead to weaker consumer demand in China. On the back of this we have downgraded our milk price forecast to $6.70.

Dairy prices fell overnight, reversing the lift we saw in the previous GDT auction. In aggregate, prices eased 2.6%, including a 1.7% fall in whole milk powder prices. Prices for AMF and butter were also down, falling by more than 5%.

Developments in markets this week have been dominated by the escalation of the trade war between the US and China. President Trump surprised markets by tweeting his intention to apply a 10% tariff on the $300 billion of Chinese imports to the US which had previously been unaffected by the trade war. These tariffs are due to take effect from 1 September. Furthermore, he has threatened that these tariffs could rise to 25%.

China has responded by letting its currency depreciate through the key level of 7 yuan to the US dollar. This helps offset some of the impact of the tariffs for Chinese exporters, but makes importing goods and services into China more expensive. The yuan has now depreciated 12% over the past 18 months. In a further retaliatory move, the Chinese Ministry of Commerce has directed Chinese companies to stop purchasing US agricultural products.

Recent developments in the trade conflict between the US and China are particularly important for two reasons. Firstly, the move drags US consumers into the front line of the trade war. Goods covered by the latest tariffs are essentially direct consumer goods. Higher prices for goods such as iPhones, shoes and baby products will be a negative shock for household budgets. Secondly, the development significantly raises the intensity of the trade war, with negative implications for the outlook for global growth, manufacturing and business investment.

Markets have reacted strongly to these developments, with equity markets falling sharply and oil prices down around

7% over the past week. These developments have also reinforced the downwards pressure on interest rates.

We have warned that Chinese demand is a key swing factor in the outlook for dairy prices over the coming year. And while growth in milk supply in key exporting regions still looks likely to be modest, recent developments suggest the outlook for Chinese consumer demand and global growth has deteriorated.

On this basis we have downgraded our milk price forecast for this season to $6.70 (previously $6.90).
