

Home Truths

13 March 2019

New Zealand house price inflation did accelerate over the New Year period, as predicted by Home Truths. But the “summer fling” for house prices was disappointing, and will prove brief. There are now ever-clearer signs that house price inflation is about to weaken again, at least in northern New Zealand.

The latest batch of monthly housing market data, covering February, showed that nationwide seasonally adjusted prices rose 0.7%, the fastest increase since November 2017. Prices have been volatile month to month, but the overall rate of price increase this summer was stronger than last summer. In February, prices fell in Otago and Southland, but there was no let up in the helter-skelter pace of house price inflation for many other parts of New Zealand – most notably Gisborne/Hawke’s Bay, Manawatu/Whanganui and Wellington, where prices are up more than 10% over the past year. Meanwhile, Auckland prices rose slightly in February, but that’s most likely a blip rather than an end to the trend of slowly falling prices in the nation’s largest city.

Prices may have been strong overall, but market turnover has been dropping away for a while, and the latest monthly data registered a further drop. Seasonally adjusted house sales in February were 5.8% lower than in January. REINZ always understates the number of sales in its initial release of the data, but even if the real drop was 4%, that’s still significant given that turnover has been falling for a few months now.

The drop in turnover has been particularly stark in Northland, Auckland and Waikato, suggesting that the north of the country is about to experience further house price weakness. In Auckland, the lack of sales has led to a surfeit of unsold houses sitting on the market – realestate.co.nz reports that there are currently around 9,400 unsold houses on the market in Auckland, up from 6,200 three years ago. To cap it all off, it is taking ever longer to sell a house, with the nationwide average time to sell widening out to 40 days, up from 37.5 a year ago.

Last year Home Truths predicted that house price inflation would pick up a bit around the New Year period, stimulated by low mortgage rates. However, we expected this would be a brief summer fling rather than anything lasting, and suggested that tax changes and the foreign buyer ban would cause house price inflation to cool over the latter half of 2019.

The “summer fling” did happen, but it was pretty lacklustre – house price inflation only ticked a little higher. Meanwhile, it is starting to look as though the house prices will be even weaker than previously anticipated over late-2019. Measured nationwide and over the whole of 2019, it is starting to look as though house price inflation will fall a bit short of our forecast of 3%.
