Clear on prices, unclear on sales

Last month Home Truths complained about a temporary state of disarray in New Zealand's house price data. One measure of house prices was skewed by the paucity of sales at the cheaper end of the market, and the other suffered a technical glitch in March.

We promised more clarity in April, and that is exactly what we now have. It now seems pretty clear that house prices are rising, but at a slower pace than last year.

The REINZ's House Price Index rose 0.6% (seasonally adjusted) in April, and is 8.6% higher than a year ago. This is the measure that may have been affected by the composition of sales, but those concerns don't apply this month - there was no big change in the composition of sales in April. So prices really are rising at the minute. That said, we still think the REINZ's annual house price inflation figure is overstated, because the composition of sales today is very different to the same time last year.

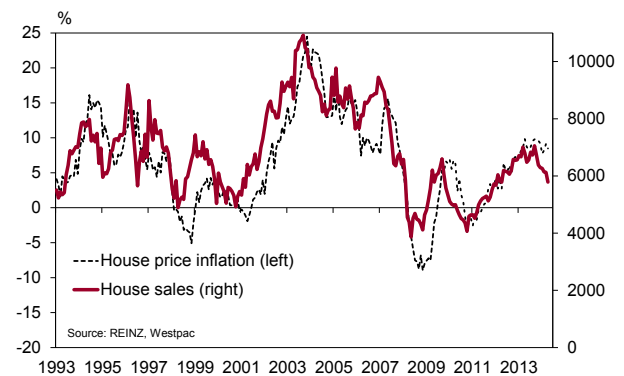

Quotable Value's (QV) monthly price index is unaffected by compositional shenanigans, and is therefore probably the better measure of house prices at present. It suggests that house prices were flat over the first few months of 2014, but have started rising again.

This seems pretty consistent with our call that the market would go through a modest, and brief, revival through the middle of 2014, before slowing more definitively later in the year. Our forecast for house price inflation this year is 5.5%, slowing to 1% next year - that still looks realistic.

Just as we are achieving more clarity on house prices, so the data on house sales has become murkier. REINZ data showed that house sales fell sharply in April, and are now 18% below the peak reached last September. But the weakness in sales may have been exaggerated by the timing of Easter and ANZAC Day - people may have treated the three-day week between the two as a holiday, thus temporarily depressing sales turnover. There will probably be a rebound in seasonally-adjusted house sales in May - we will judge the true state of market turnover by the size of that bounce.

Still, one cannot escape the overall impression that house sales are now sharply slower than they were a year ago. As the chart below shows, slower turnover portends lower house price inflation. Again, judging by that simple chart, 5.5% house price inflation for this year seems a reasonable target.

Finally, the future of the RBNZ's limits on high-LVR mortgage lending is now clearer. We had speculated that the RBNZ might ease up on its speed limit soon. But in a speech last week Deputy Governor Grant Spencer put paid to that idea. The RBNZ has indicated that while the restrictions are temporary, the earliest date for beginning to remove them is later this year. That said, the banks are loosening up a little on lending to first homebuyers, and are able to do so while still remaining within the RBNZ's stipulations. This will be a modest source of stimulus for the market through the middle of this year.
